IF I COULD INVENT SOMETHING NEW...

Inventions are creations of man made with thought. To invent simply means to create, like how Thomas Edison invented the light bulb or how the Wright brothers invented the airplane. Inventing something new to some people is like bringing something new to life. Science fiction even has its own share of inventions, crazy ones like transmogrifiers which apparently help you steal identities. But if I were to invent something, I know exactly what I would want.

I would invent a time machine. I have always had the thought on my mind about special moments for me in time like my surprise birthday party or the time my family and I went to the beach, but once those moments were gone, I knew I was never going to get them back which is why when I heard of the term "time travel," I had hoped that I or someone else could make it a reality.

Just imagine being able to go back to the day human beings figured out how to invent, or the day World War I started so you could stop it. I know as impossible as it is, many people have thought about making a time machine. I also can't forget being able to see your future, knowing whether you get that last scoop of ice cream that you and your siblings were arguing about, but those are little thoughts. We can always go further and see whether humans have microchips in their brains in a few decades or whether humans evolve so much in a 1000 years that they aren't even considered human anymore.

Along with the time machine, I would like to invent a smaller version, one that changes time in objects but doesn't take them back in time. It works like burning a pizza, putting it into the time changer and then entering how many minutes into the past or future and activating it. You will be able to see the burnt pizza reversing back into a well done pizza as it was before it got burnt. Everyone would love not having to worry about burning their food since they can just make it perfect again. Take heed that it works on humans too so you can see your mom or dad's 5 years old self.

If such a time machine existed, it would definitely be a closely guarded one. But don't worry, all had been figured out. There would be strict guidelines and regulations in place to ensure its safe and responsible use.

What a fascinating and intriguing concept! Now tell me, if you could travel back in time or glimpse the future, what memorable moments or events would you choose to revisit or preview?
