Essay:If I could invent something new

If I could invent something that had never been created, I would invent a device that can trigger compassion in people's hearts.

Mankind hurts one another and things that belong to the earth because often their priorities and desire come before anything else. Other people and things can become obstacles that need to be destroyed in order to obtain a goal. A moment of compassion would have people reconsider what they are seeking or destroying. People would see beyond their own vision and realize there are other things that may be more significant. They would see other people, each other, and see life for the beautiful and fragile thing that it is. After all, compassion is feeling sympathy for another being and seeing past the obstacle in front of one's goal.

As the world continues to develop, man continues to desire for more. People are rarely satisfied with what they have. They want more territory, more power, more of everything. As people compete in this race for more, they disregard human beings. My Invention would trigger something powerful that could move and transform individuals. Compassion may just seem like a gentle emotion, but it can be more powerful enough to stop someone from hurting another person. It can help people think of others and to be careful with their actions.

My invention has the power to change the world. It could stop wars, people from destroying the planet and mankind from hurting one another. People become blinded when they seek a goal or want something that belongs to another. This one emotion would help people look at the world and the people around them with clarity. One little device that triggers this emotion could be more meaningful than any other invention that might provide additional convenience and comfort to people.

In a world where people are rarely satisfied with what they have, it is inevitable that greed and selfishness can overpower any consideration for mankind. Sometimes, the emotion are so powerful, they can be causes for wars, genocide and mass destruction. My invention would transform the world and help people to open their eyes and have sympathy for things beyond their personal self.
